

ADMISSIONS PROFILE

Fall 2009 Entering Class

Admission to the College is based upon a careful evaluation of each individual's application file. Although the Admissions Committee relies on the undergraduate grade point average and the Law School Admission Test (LSAT) score to determine the applicant's academic potential, other non-quantitative factors believed to be relevant to success in law school are considered. Such factors include the quality of the applicant's previous education experience, participation in extracurricular activities or community service, employment, experience after undergraduate school, significant graduate work, and thoughtful letters of recommendation.

The educational philosophy of the College reflects a belief that a quality legal education is enhanced by having a heterogeneous student body. The Committee, therefore, also considers race, cultural background, unusual personal circumstances, and age.

While a baccalaureate degree from an accredited college or university is required prior to enrolling in the College of Law, no specific major or particular course is prescribed. For admissions purposes, the undergraduate major is less important than the quality of instruction and the level of academic achievement attained. The student preparing for law should take courses sufficiently difficult to assist in the development of the rigorous intellectual discipline essential to law school success.
